This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1919 edition. Excerpt: ... Chapter IX The Function of the Parents THE importance of the parents has already been repeatedly referred to and insisted upon. They are the first recipients of the love-interest and therefore tend ever after to serve as models for that interest. Not only are they the first objects of love, but because they represent a love attachment from which the child must ultimately break away in order to acquire its independence, they are the first objects to incite its antagonism, they are the first objects of its hate. The relation of the parent to the child is ambivalent. We see in it again an illustration of the parallel path of opposites. The parents then are the first to attract the outgoing energies--interest, libido, love, hate--of the child, they are the objects toward which its first attempts to find an object of interest outside its own body are directed, and therefore they, more than anyone or anything else at any time in the life of the child, are of importance as giving it its first forms of expression. If our fate is the fate of our love life, then it is in these early days when we first learn to love that our fate is decided. Ever afterward we are conditioned by these first experiences, for no matter in what direction or how far we may go along the path of development, the goal we attain must be determined by the way we started out--whether we started straight forward, or deviated in this or that direction, little or much. To be sure there may be little about our developed, adult personalities to suggest whence they came, but theoretically, at least, it should be possible to reconstruct the several stages. All this will make still better understandable what I have already stated, namely, that much heretofore credited to
